For the People's Press THE COMET.

Hall splendid stranger of the sky! What tidings from immensity? On trust of high import art sent From him the Great Omnipotent? What is thine errand? what art thou? Does terror clothe thy flashing browl While from thy feathery train afer Thou scatterest pestilence and war? Blighting the nations with thy breath Presaging famine, plague and death?, Or dost thy peaceful path pursue? To thine allegiance faithful true.

Mysterious visitant I oh say, Art thou the creature of a day? Glowing with phosphorescent fire. Full soon in darkness to expire, Like some bright beacon blazing high, To flare aloft, smoulder and die? Or, driven-from thine orbit cast,-Like autumn's leaf before the blast. Roaming for ave in search of rest, Like unlaid ghost, unshriven, unblest? Do thy eccentric periods chime The footsteps of revolving time? Or markest, in thy majesty, The cycles of eternity 1 Where wast thou when this beautious earth, Received its fair, and primal birth? When morning stars broke forth in song, Didst sing amid that glorious through Exulting in thy Maker's praise, The holy One of uncient days.

Celestial ranger from afar! Rolling on high thy fiery car! While traversing the wide abyes. Hast seen another world like this? By the Creator's band so blest, So fallen, faithless, to its trust, So vast a theatre of grace, Throughout the realms of boundless space?

Through the illimitable waste, Oh hast thou never seen afar? Some bright, peculiar, glorious star? The radiant mansions of the blest, Where weary ones at last may rest; Where uncreated glory shone, Around the great Eternal's throne? Where Christ our mediator stood, And waved his sceptre bought with blood? The Lamb from the foundation slain. Who trod the wine-press all alone Where saint and seraph, joined to raise, One long-foul authem to his praise. Mingling the high and holy strain, With Alleluin, praise amen-

Though still my wayward fancy broods On those aerial solitudes. I ask not if thou knowest where Lie the dark realms of long despair, Oh! wherefore I seek to know, More of the dread abodes of woel And all in vain, to ask of thee, The secrets of eternity; A fellow servant thou of mine To trace thy destined path is thine Tis mine to bow me to His will, Who bids his creatures, "peace be still".

gay belle and the servant girl, the aristocratic and the humble,-all were there. It was a most singular and animated scene to the eye of a stranger; the brlliancy of illumi. nated stores with their holiday suit of evergreens, the many pretty temptations which every window presented to those who were selecting their Christmas gifts, and that $2,00 ly passing from window to window, examining every curious toy, every decorated cake, and every article of taste or fancy which had been placed therein. It seemed as if every individual in the crowded street was content for the time to throw aside the seriousness of riper years, 'and be a child again.' Here an illuminated hall told of the merry dance, and there of fancy fairs for the building of one church, or the paying for another. Now and then the slow moving throng were impeded by another throng as dense as around the doors of a theatre, or by the rattling cabs and omnibuses which blockaded the crossings. Many a heavy heart grew light, and many a heavy purse grew lighter, amid the purchases of that evening. Gifts there were for parents, sisters, brothers, and friends, and there too were toys for the little ones who were fast asleep at home, with their stockings hung in the chimney awaiting the visit of Kriss Kringle. Many a young dreamer that night saw their welcome visitor descend the chimney with his wallet of toys, and many a listening ear heard 'the tramping' of tiny steeds 'upon the roof.' It might have passed for a dream, however, had not the well filled stockings in the morning horne witness that Kriss Kringle had been

> Now turn we to a dimly-lighted room in the third story of a dingy looking brick house in George Street. It is small in di-mensions, but the bed which stands in one corner, and the small cook stove which occupies the middle of the room, show that it is at once both chamber and kitchen .-But the room is not destitute of comfort, for a coarse rag carpet covers the floor, and the small pine table which stands near the stove, is covered with a neat white cloth, on which is spread the evening meal. It is simple enough to suit the abstemious taste. but I cannot pity the partakers, for there is a loaf of nice light bread, a slice of real Philadelphia-looking butter, and a pitcher of the delicious Schuylkill water. There are no curtains to the window, but the close shutters make the room look so warm and home-like, that we almost forget the deficiency. By the table sits an aged female reading from a well-worn copy of the Scriptures, while by her side, a young girl is diligently sewing. The one small candle which burns thereon, sufficeth for them both, and happier are they than many who sit listlessly by their astral lights, or move where the brilliant camphene but showeth a countenance beaming with the excite-
